

there are many enthusiasts who received their introduction to climbing in a party led by Bill. Quiet and unassuming, he possessed a remarkable patience for detail and an organising ability which was for ever planning new expeditions to the hills. His knowledge of the Scottish hills was very thorough, and there was hardly a "Munro" which had not been climbed by him. He had also climbed in Austria, and an account of his experiences there appeared in the Journal, Vol. XV, 1939, pp. 40-50.

Besides his interest in climbing, Bill was a keen skier, and displayed the same energy and enthusiasm in this field as he did in climbing. All his many friends will long remember his infectious enthusiasm for the mountains and the open air, and those who shared these activities with him will miss his comradeship whenever they revisit the hills which were so loved by him.

GEORGE L. MCINTYRE.

GEORGE L. MCINTYRE was one of the oldest members of the Club, joining in 1891. He died in April 1946 at the age of eighty-six. In his prime he was a climber of great energy and contributed a number of articles to the Club Journal. He served on the Committee from 1908 till 1920. Although he was not known to many Club members for a number of years past, he retained a keen interest in the Club and attended almost all the Indoor Meets, and, regularly, the Annual General Meetings. He was a photographer of considerable ability, and a number of his lantern slides are to be found in the Club collection.
